Step 3: Go to Settings
Scroll down within the menu and find "Settings." Tap on it to access the settings options.

Step 4: Privacy Settings
In the settings menu, you'll see a section called "Privacy." Tap on this section to open it.

Step 5: Activity Status
Within the "Privacy" section, locate "Activity Status." This setting allows you to control whether others can see when you were last active on Instagram. Tap on "Activity Status" to proceed.

Step 6: Disable Show Activity Status
You'll now see a toggle switch next to "Show Activity Status." By default, this setting is enabled, showing others when you were last active. To turn off this feature, simply toggle the switch to the off position.

Step 7: Return to Your Profile
After disabling the "Show Activity Status" feature, you can exit the settings and return to your profile. This will complete the process.

Once you've followed these steps, your followers and others won't be able to see your activity status, including when you were last active and whether you're currently online. This includes the "likes" you give to others' posts, offering a sense of privacy and control over your interactions.

Disabling likes on Instagram can be a strategic move if you're seeking to minimize external validation or to create a more authentic digital presence. However, it's important to note that this action may affect engagement with your posts, as others won't be able to see how many likes your content has received. Consider your goals and priorities before deciding whether to disable likes.

Remember that Instagram frequently updates its features and settings, so it's a good idea to check for any changes or updates that might affect your preferences. By taking charge of your experience on the platform, you can ensure that it aligns with your personal values and intentions.
