

Stem cells are cells that remain undifferentiated with the ability to differentiate into a variety of cell types.

Stem cells research:

Stem cells have the potential to treat a variety of diseases and are important in medical research and drug development. The most important potential application of human stem cells could be used for cell-based therapies.